

Fact Sheet 10—Extradition and Mutual Assistance relationships with other countries

Country lists

Attachments to this Fact Sheet list Australia's extradition and mutual assistance relationships.

With which countries does Australia have extradition relationships?

The Australian Government processes all incoming and outgoing extradition requests in accordance with the Extradition Act 1988.

Australia can only accept requests from countries that are declared as 'extradition countries' in regulations made under the Extradition Act.

Extradition regulations have been made for four broad groups of extradition countries:

- countries with which Australia has a bilateral treaty
- countries that are party to multilateral treaties (with extradition obligations) that Australia is also a party to,
- countries who are a member to the "London Scheme", an arrangement of less than treaty status governing extradition between countries of the Commonwealth and their dependencies, and
- some countries with which Australia has no treaty relationship.

Australia can make an extradition request to any country. However, in the absence of a treaty, whether the request will be accepted depends on the domestic laws of that country.

With which countries does Australia have a mutual assistance relationship?

Australia can make or receive a request for mutual assistance from any country, and there is no need for countries to be prescribed in regulations. However, to facilitate mutual assistance, Australia has concluded a number of bilateral treaties.

Mutual assistance requests are considered under the Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters Act 1987.

Australia can make a mutual assistance request to any country. However, in the absence of a treaty, whether the request is accepted will depend on the domestic laws of the country.

This Fact Sheet provides information—not legal advice

This is a general information note. It does not give legal advice on the operation of the Extradition Act 1988 or the Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters Act 1987 and should not be relied on as legal advice.
